

Sending Church Pro Tips

A Sending Church takes responsibility for a new church plant until the plant is self-sustaining, self-governing and self-propagating. Serving a church planter as a Sending Church is an incredible opportunity, but that opportunity comes with great responsibility.

Here are some “pro tips” for sending your planter well:

DO

- Take responsibility for the planter as you would your own staff member.
- Walk this journey with him until the plant is self-sustaining. It typically takes three to five years for a plant to effectively meet the budget solely from the congregation’s giving.
- Officially send the planter out with a commissioning service and get your church members involved.
- Hold the planter personally accountable to the North American Mission Board (NAMB) Code of Conduct.
- Assist and hold the planter financially accountable on a quarterly basis.
- Find creative ways to bless and keep in touch with your planter (at least once a month). Call, email, text and visit your planter throughout the year.
- Treat him as a staff member by including him in staff meetings and retreats when it makes sense geographically.
- Be available to listen, guide, struggle alongside and celebrate with your planter.
- Mentor him in your strengths as a pastor and help him find a coach who has planting experience.
- Plan mission trips according to the church plant’s timeframe and strategic outreach needs.
- Help the planter enlist and nurture supporting churches.

DON'T

- Overpromise and underdeliver. Know your capacity and make commitments within those parameters.
- Make offers of help that only consider your agenda. Don’t assume that the most convenient time for you to take a trip is the best time to go support your planter.
- Treat him like your travel agent for mission trips. From the beginning of the planning process to the end of the trip, make sure you are a help, instead of a burden.
- Send outdated books or materials, like VBS curriculum or seminary textbooks you don’t want.
- Require him to attend all your staff meetings, even if he’s planting geographically close to you.
- Underfund. Be reasonable about how much financial support a planter will need in his ministry location.
- Overfund. Don’t wildly exceed a plant’s self-sustaining giving potential and create unrealistic precedents once they are a self-sustaining congregation.
- Force him to do things just like your church. The way you do ministry may be best for your context and community, but that doesn’t mean it’s best for his.
- Require multiple reports or constantly nag him for information. Accountability is key, but you also need to maintain a relationship that demonstrates trust in your planter.
